Family business or family feud?

By Sally McKenzie, CMCA

Certainly, when it comes to the family, the ties that bind can also blind. What is supposed to be a source of strength is often the cause of stress and anxiety. And maintaining family harmony in the face of workplace challenges can be no small undertaking for any business, particularly dental practices. Although everyone may be related, clearly everyone is not alike. Families, as we know, are composed of varying personalities, opinions, styles, problems and issues, all of which without clear accountability and understanding can easily lead to simply get along, let alone work together.

The family has a profound impact in shaping our decisions, our values and our culture. It also has a huge effect on the economy at large. In fact, family businesses encompass 80-90 percent of all businesses in North America. In the United States alone, family businesses account for 50 percent of U.S. gross domestic product and 60 percent of the country’s employment and 78 percent of all new job creation according to the University of Southern Maine’s Institute for Family-Owned Business. Certainly, the family business is an economic powerhouse, but for those working in the trenches of the “blood and flesh” unit, it’s the emotional toll that packs the bigger punch.

Family businesses can be very complex, to say the least. And navigating through the potential minefields is no small challenge for many. After all, when it comes to working with family there is a lot to gain—and a lot to lose. In dentistry, family-run practices are common with fathers and sons, husbands and wives, mothers and daughters, siblings, in-laws, aunts, uncles, etc. working under the same roof.

Some function very effectively together and, typically, those that are the most successful are able to deal with business issues as partners, not as husband-wife, father-son, mother-daughter, etc. However, without clearly defined roles and detailed practice systems, emotion and family “issues” can quickly take over.

Family communication and trust are essential. Clearly defined management systems and accountability are absolutely critical. Maybe the practitioner’s spouse has been doing things “that way” since 1999, but asking prospective patients whether they have insurance immediately after the summer indicates that she or he would like to schedule an appointment simply isn’t good for the office—no matter how long she’s been doing it “that way.” Perhaps brother Joe, the financial coordinator, is allowing his friends and neighbors to carry balances indefinitely, sending accounts receivables over the top. And Aunt Carol is habitually late. Joe, Carol and yes, even the practitioner’s spouse, must be educated and held accountable for their systems, their actions and their results.

The bottom line is: Just because you are the spouse, the sister, the practitioner’s spouse, or their of brother or sister work well together in their general practice, but Dave the brother and periodontist, wants his own office, separate and away from dad and his brother. Although it may be hard to reject the family, doing so early on will be much easier for everyone. So, when does that leave the rest of the “family” team that would rather keep it where it is? What’s the cause of stress and anxiety. And whose vision gets priority? What steps will the practice take to achieve that vision and those goals? Who will be responsible for which areas? How will the practice measure its success? It’s those issues—where you want to take the practice—that require open and honest communication, but can cause significant friction. Yet all the players in the family practice must be on the same page. If not, it’s grounds for a family meeting, probably several.

Ultimately, there may be those on the family team that would rather strike out on their own. In some cases, that is the best alternative. Maybe Chuck the dad and Brian the son work well together in their general practice, but Dave the brother and periodontist, wants his own office, separate and away from dad and his brother. Although it may be hard to reject the family, doing so early on will be much easier for

‘Too often family members won’t question one another’s decisions or actions.’

Most successful business arrangements require a more formal organization. Dental practices are no different. There needs to be a clear designation of exactly who is responsible for what and what the family wants to get out of the practice.

Do you want it to grow? Do you want to keep it where it is? What’s more important to you, giving up some control or growing or keeping control and staying where you are? What’s your vision of the practice? What if it’s different than your spouse’s or your brother’s or your dad’s? Whose vision gets priority? What steps will the practice take to achieve that vision and those goals? Who will be responsible for which areas? How will the practice measure its success? It’s those issues—where you want to take the practice—that require open and honest communication, but can cause significant friction. Yet all the players in the family practice must be on the same page. If not, it’s grounds for a family meeting, probably several.

Ultimately, there may be those on the “family” team that would rather strike out on their own. In some cases, that is the best alternative. Maybe Chuck the dad and Brian the son work well together in their general practice, but Dave the brother and periodontist, wants his own office, separate and away from dad and his brother. Although it may be hard to reject the family, doing so early on will be much easier for everyone, and Dave will be far less likely to feel that he sacrificed his own vision and goals for the sake of “the family practice.”

See FAMILY, Page 8

In other cases, family members are in the wrong jobs and would be much more effective in another position. For example, Ellen the wife is working as the office manager but would make a much better financial coordinator. The dentist must have the courage to make the change and Ellen must have the courage to accept it, a tall order for both. And oftentimes, it’s necessary to bring in outside help to navigate the players through the process of developing job descriptions and identifying who will work best in which positions. The fact is that family members are simply too close to the issue — literally.

Things to consider

Certainly, there are those families that sincerely enjoy working together and are successful in doing so. But it’s not for everyone. Before you decide to partner with your spouse, sister, brother, mother, father, uncle, cousin or whomever, evaluate the decision carefully. We all have family members whose company we enjoy, but we wouldn’t necessarily want to spend 40 hours a week with them. We’ve all made excuses for that eccentric relative who made a poor financial or professional decision here or there, but we wouldn’t want to have to do it on a regular basis, no matter how good hearted he is or hard working she is.

Consider whether this arrangement is consistent with your personal practice philosophy of care and business management approach. Carefully evaluate whether you will have the opportunity to grow as a professional and fulfill your personal goals. Is this the career move you’ve dreamed of or dreaded? Will you be given the opportunity to use your strengths in making a contribution or pigeonholed into a particular role? If you believe you can contribute your expertise, abilities and know-how to the practice, your chances of success increase exponentially. They decrease significantly, however, if you make the move because of family pressure or a sense of entitlement.

Realistically consider if you can work with your family. Being honest with yourself from the beginning will potentially save you years of frustration and discontent. Remember, a “good son,” “good daughter,” or “supportive spouse” is far different from being an effective business partner. It will take courage to raise issues that may put you at odds with your family. And serious problems can arise if communication is weak or if the relationships in general tend to be strained. Be sure that you are emotionally and economically prepared to leave if frustrations become too great.

Certainly, for some, working with your spouse, mom, dad, brother, sister, etc. can feel more like a life sentence than the opportunity of a lifetime. However, for many who choose this road it can and does work if the systems are in place, the roles are clearly defined and communication is open. And if, most importantly, everyone understands that when it comes to the family practice, it’s business first and family second.

About the author

Sally McKenzie, certified management consultant, is a nationally known lecturer and author. She is CEO of McKenzie Management, which provides highly successful and proven management services to dentistry, and has since 1980. McKenzie Management offers a full line of educational and management products, which are available on its Web site, www.mckenziemgmt.com. In addition, the company offers a vast array of Practice Enrichment Programs and team training. McKenzie is the editor of the e-Management newsletter and The Dentist’s Network newsletter sent complimentary to practices nationwide. To subscribe visit www.mckenziemgmt.com and www.thedentistsnetwork.net. McKenzie welcomes specific practice questions and can be reached toll free at (877) 777-6151 or at sallymck@mckenziemgmt.com.

Quality. Reliability. Simplicity.

Whether you are new to implant dentistry or have been placing implants for years, you will appreciate the easy handling and superior esthetic results possible with CAMLOG® dental implants.

- Precision engineering
- Simple and safe surgical placement
- User-friendly system makes restoration simple

Contact your Henry Schein Dental Sales Consultant to learn more about the CAMLOG® Implant System, or call CAMLOG directly at 1-877-537-8862.

www.camlogimplants.com