Cases involving the employment status of ostensibly self-employed associates continue to come before Employment Tribunals (ET). ETs are “first instance” tribunals, so the decision of one ET is not binding on others. However, in practice, tribunals often look to earlier ET decisions for guidance (and perhaps sometimes inspiration!).

The higher courts (whose decisions may be binding) have said, time and time again, that decisions involving employment status depend entirely on the facts of each case. The courts stress that a simple “checklist” approach to the problem is not sufficient. Each court or tribunal has to look at all the circumstances of each case.

Grotepass v Singh

In the recent case of Grotepass v Singh (which came before the Southampton ET in July 2009), the Claimant who had been an associate of the Respondent principal, claimed he had actually been employed. There had been no written associate’s agreement.

The ET found that the Claimant had been treated as self-employed for tax purposes. Fees were made up of private patient fees per item charge, and monthly Denplan capitation fees. Fees were collected by the Respondent’s reception staff and the associate Claimant, for example, that there had been no binding obligation on the principal to provide the associate with any particular amount of work or work of a particular kind.

The ET took the view, on the facts of this case, that the Claimant was not an employee. The tribunal felt that there had been no “mutuality of obligation” between the principal Respondent and the associate Claimant, for example, that there had been no binding obligation on the principal to provide the associate with any particular amount of work or work of a particular kind.

The ET pointed out that the Claimant had absolute clinical freedom. The ET also felt that the fact that the Claimant had not been paid a regular annual salary, and had no fixed hours, together with the “self-employed” arrangements for his pay, were all inconsistent with his being an employee.

Kalsoom v Clements & Pema

Interestingly, the finding of the Southampton ET in connection with the “mutuality of obligation” point, was not consistent with the finding of the Birmingham ET in the case of Kalsoom v Clements and Pema, which was heard January 2009.

As in Grotepass, the preliminary point relating to the employment status of the Claimant fell for preliminary discussion. However, in Kalsoom, the ET also went on to consider whether the Claimant also met an extended definition of “employee” under the Sex Discrimination Act, and the definition of “worker” under the Employment Rights Act. A finding that the Claimant fell within the extended definition of “employee”/“worker” for those purposes, might enable the Claimant to pursue claims for discrimination, unlawful deduction of wages etc (regardless of the Claimant’s status as an employee to seek compensation for alleged unfair dismissal). (I should make it clear that the ET were not considering the merits of the Kalsoom case, simply the preliminary issue).

In Kalsoom, the Employment Judge did find that there was sufficient “mutuality of obligation” to create a contract between the parties sufficient to enable the ET to decide that the extended definition of “employee” applied, to enable the Claimant to pursue her claim for discrimination. The ET also found the Claimant was a “worker”.

On the facts of this case, the ET did not consider however, that Ms Kalsoom was an employee for the purposes of bringing a claim for unfair dismissal (a similar finding to Grotepass).

What this means

Although the Kalsoom and Grotepass cases provide some guidance, nevertheless the legal position on the status of associates for employment law purposes remains murky. The ETs latched onto the fact that, in each case, the Claimant had sole clinical judgement, and thought this to be indicative of self-employment rather than employment. On this point I remain unconvinced.

Where businesses employ highly trained professionals, professional judgement will frequently be exercised by the individuals involved, without interference by the employer. I remain to be convinced that an associate’s freedom to exercise clinical judgement is necessarily inconsistent with them being an employee.

Lessons to be drawn

In dealing with practice acquisitions and sales, I am often surprised at the number of practices that I encounter where there are no written associates contracts in place.

One important lesson to be drawn from these two recently reported cases, is that a properly drawn-up associates agreement, although not entirely conclusive, may go a long way to avoid future challenges that a self-employed associate is actually an employee.

It is important to remember that associates’ agreements are not “one size fits all”. Each situation should be properly and individually considered, taking legal advice where necessary, and ensuring that agreements are tailored to particular circumstances.

About the author

Tim Lee is commercial law director and solicitor at Young & Lee Solicitors Limited in Birmingham. For more information, visit www.younglee.co.uk or call 0121 655 5255.

Non-precious crowns

only: £233.99

Call your local Account Manager on 0800 652 6878 for more information and a FREE user guide