Growing your practice

Simon Hocken highlights some of the things to avoid if you really want to grow your practice and entice new patients though the surgery doors.

Recently, I chaired a seminar entitled How to grow your practice in challenging times for the British Dental Association (BDA). Throughout the seminar, speakers presented their comments and ideas on growing practices. Included were some thought-provoking sessions on a number of different areas including business strategies, practice profile, value added service, motivating and retaining staff, financial management, saving tax and reviewing your prices to maximise your profits. All of these issues are of course vital considerations, and time spent discussing them was both interesting and valuable.

I visit many practices in the course of a year and it is fair to say that most, sadly, are not three quarters of the principals saw their practice turnover fall in 2009 compared with 2008. Now, although there has been a recession, which has obviously been taken into account, the straw poll shows inverse results for the practices that we work with; where more that 75 per cent of practice principals saw an increase in their turnover last year.

What is growth?

To me, growth is apparent when a practice has marketing that creates in excess of 50 new clients a month, 560 additional clients a year and therefore 1,020 additional clients every three years.

What is going on?

Although many practices have improved their physical facilities and many have changed or perhaps improved the services they offer, there are still many aspects that remain the same and hinder a practice’s growth. For example, many still occupy the same buildings that they have done for many years, with the same number of surgeries and the same number of clinicians. Adding to this, there are essential the same number of new patients entering the surgery and also the same number of existing patients leaving each month.

At the recent Alpha Omega International Dental Fraternity (and also at BDA HQ in London) I was invited to speak at, a straw poll of the 50 or so dentists was conducted to see if this was an issue for them as well. The results revealed that around 16 per cent of practice principals are presiding over shrinking practices.

It is certainly evident to me that this ‘managed status quo’ is alarmingly common and not seen, in my opinion, as ‘growth’. Some may say that it is at least evolution, but this is not growth when considering it in pure business terms.

Let us return now to the BDA’s How to grow your practice in challenging times seminar as previously mentioned. The type of growth that I describe is essentially down to acquiring more new patients every month than the number that leave the practice. However, what is equally important is having a team that can deliver the following:

- Effective consultations
- Effective treatment plan presentations
- Effective techniques for overcoming objections
- Effective closing strategies; that is, ask for the business

Ultimately, this is what makes a practice grow. Your marketing strategies, as important as they are, bring people to your door or onto the end of your phone line; it is the selling skills and sales systems that really grow practices.

While you consider the issues above, here are 20 sales prevention strategies:

- A website that doesn’t bring in new patients
- Patients who have no idea what you offer
- No sales support materials
- Nowhere to talk to patients other than in the surgery or at the front desk
- No data on your enquirers, other than in the surgery or at the front desk
- No effective patient-retention systems
- No seasonal offers
- Clinical and reception team lack self confidence and/or product knowledge
- Lack of payment/credit facilities
- Team members lacking selling skills
- Dentists and team members with ‘dodgy’ smiles
- Dirty premises
- Closing doors/phone lines at lunchtime
- Only having one phone line into the practice and no answering service
- Clinicians going home early because there wasn’t a patient booked
- Eager patients can’t get an appointment
- Chatting to colleagues or eating while taking the call
- Having mobile phones on in surgery or at the desk
- Dentists loitering around the front desk
- Inefficient software systems

Perhaps it’s time to get some advice on growing your practice.

Button Image

UNIVERSAL NANO COMPOSITE
SYNERGY® D6

Super Saver kits just £49.50* with FREE sample of new highly acclaimed SwissFlex polishing discs

WIN 2 nights Zermatt/Switzerland

About the author

Dr Simon Hocken

Founding partner of Breathe Business, a wealth of experience as a successful private dentist and business coach, helping clients recognise developing trends, increase turnover and find the perfect balance between their personal and professional lives. Breathe Business is its unique leading coaching and consultancy company which specialises in working with dental principals and their teams in order to develop and grow their practices. For more information, contact Dr Simon Hocken and the Breathe team by calling 0845 299 7209 or emailing info@newbreath.co.uk.

Special offer

WIN a ‘wellness’ weekend.

FREEPHONE 0800 295454 ext 223 or 224 today for details.