I t looks like £600-£800 billion of NHS funds may be handed to general practitioners by the government to help practice owners bear the responsibility for their own budgets and cutting out layers and layers of middle management.

Responsibility will be handed to GPs working in local groups, who will commission services or provide them by working in rotas with each other. The health secretary Mr Lansley believes that if GPs are responsible for their own budgets and have to come out of-hours care, most will decide to go back to offering weekend and evening cover themselves or in local groups.

At present, funds are given by the Government to PCPs, which pay for patients from their area to be treated in hospital. Under new plans, GPs – who are currently not responsible for paying for hospital treatment – will have to provide the money instead and pay the hospitals directly for each patient they refer!

As dentists, we have spent the last three years bemoaning the UDA system and the general lack of understanding of what it costs to run a successful dental practice. What would happen if we were given the same opportunity as GPs? Is there a glimmer of hope that we might hold our own funding too in the future, and if so would it happen before we would that in the hands of clinicians, dentistry would make the headlines for the right reasons instead of the wrong reasons?

Last year, my PCT Tower Hamlets set up the first dental practice-based commissioning group in the country, of which I am co-chair. It has been a journey of revelation for my colleagues and I, and we have realised the opportunities are enormous, as are the responsibilities. If dentists were entrusted as clinical commissioning agents, we would see that huge chunks of our budgets were being gobbled up by specialist opinions for patients with localised gingivitis, might be tempted to explore ideas to keep more patients, and some of that funding would be spent providing the money instead and pay the hospitals directly for each patient they refer!

In fact any and all of these are possible – we could do things differently, we could do different things and we could do things for different people – and all of them could work if they were corrected.

The reality in any dental practice is that if we get practice revenue numbers right, cutting salaries and personnel costs and causing disenchantment throughout the practice would not be necessary. Practices have base costs which are impossible to circumvent – the fixed costs of equipment and premises, and those of compliance and a core complement of staff.

The financial profile of a dental practice is not rocket science. Sadly, when figures of 25-40 per cent profit are reported, and dentists are considered greedy, a little investigation shows financial naiveté not greed, clinical hats not small business hats, and an inability on the part of the assessors to interpret practice figures - a job that accountants and practice valuers could probably do on the back of an envelope.

Many dentists own the premises they work in – if they rented their premises to another dentist to run the practice, as landlord they would receive rental income from their investment in property, and the tenant would show a lower practice profit. However because practice owners do not charge themselves rent, they mistakenly count the “rent savings” as “dental practice profit”, when it is actually direct return on investment in property and nothing to do with the practice per se.

The other source of extra perceived “profit” is a direct result of practice owners providing a significant chunk of clinical services themselves, even the practice owner working in the business as a clinician throws his own blood, sweat and tears into the profit arena too, so dentists are horrified to learn that if they paid themselves the same rate they paid their associates, the profit figures for the practice would look unsustain- able. This dependence on the owner of the practice has resulted in smaller practices being particularly hard hit recently. Along with the economic crisis, the reality of reallocating work to DCPs, realocating clinical time to unfunded administration, or engaging more experienced managers is an impact on the bottom line.

Would you like to increase your revenue streams, prepare for a new way of working under the new government, meet the regulations of Care Quality Commission and be in control of your own profits? Email the author at seema.sharma@dentabyte.co.uk or log onto www.dentabyte.co.uk to find out more about our PEP conference on 1st October 2010, when Seema, Andy Action of Frank Taylor Associates and Kevin Lewis of Dental Protection will take you through the secrets of succeeding in the changing clinical and commercial environment by “pepping up your practice”!

The other source of extra perceived “profit” is a direct result of practice owners providing a significant chunk of clinical services themselves, even the practice owner working in the business as a clinician throws his own blood, sweat and tears into the profit arena too, so dentists are horrified to learn that if they paid themselves the same rate they paid their associates, the profit figures for the practice would look unsustainable. This dependence on the owner of the practice has resulted in smaller practices being particularly hard hit recently. Along with the economic crisis, the reality of reallocating work to DCPs, realocating clinical time to unfunded administration, or engaging more experienced managers is an impact on the bottom line.

Would you like to increase your revenue streams, prepare for a new way of working under the new government, meet the regulations of Care Quality Commission and be in control of your own profits? Email the author at seema.sharma@dentabyte.co.uk or log onto www.dentabyte.co.uk to find out more about our PEP conference on 1st October 2010, when Seema, Andy Action of Frank Taylor Associates and Kevin Lewis of Dental Protection will take you through the secrets of succeeding in the changing clinical and commercial environment by “pepping up your practice”!

FUTURE PROOF YOUR PRACTICE

FRIDAY 1ST OCTOBER 2010

Join us for a day conference on the changing world of both NHS and private dentistry, including:

COC
- Future commissioning and performance management
- Goodwill protection

Confirmed speakers:

Seema Sharma of Dentabyte

An advocate of combining organisational leadership with clinical leadership for success, practice owner Seema is uniquely positioned to advise you on practical practice management solutions which have been instrumental in implementing her vision in her own NHS and private practices.

Andy Action of Frank Taylor Associates

With their uniquely accurate and detailed clinical and commercial evaluation reports, Frank Taylors have emerged as leading practice valuers, with extensive knowledge of the dental sector. Andy will impart a wealth of guidance on how to practice well.

Kevin Lewis of Dental Protection

Kevin spent 20 years in full time general practice having written his dental practice smack agreement. He was appointed dental director of Dental Protection in 1988 and will explore the fine balance in the clinical and commercial interface to practice.

PRICE: £295 per delegate. To include refreshments, lunch and detailed conference folder with invaluable COC and dental practice management guidance.

VENUE: De Vere Conference Rooms, Canvey Wharf, London E14

Book online at: www.dentabyte.co.uk

Or call: 020 8297 9100

---

Who is in control of your future profits?

asks Seema Sharma