Looking towards the future

In the fourth and final part of this interview, Neel Kothari talks to Susie Sanderson about the amalgam issue and her thoughts on the future of dentistry.
SS: I came into the job at the time of the new contract. I started in the February before the new contract was imposed on the 1st of April, so almost simultaneously. I think that my biggest achievement has been to make sure that at every stage we challenged the fact that it wasn’t fit for purpose and that successfully that challenge was understood, listened to and that we’ve achieved, in political terms, a turn-around of intention, to reform really quite swiftly.

So I think I’m extraordinarily proud of that. I gave evidence to the Health Select Committee and I’m proud of having done that successfully and been treated with respect and had an influence there, as well as the huge amount of teamwork that went behind it.

And I also consider that, as far as we possibly can, getting the profession to work together has also been something that I’m proud of.

I’m very keen that in the future we’re never divided and ruled and I suppose that if I have a message for my successor, it’s to keep on trying to make sure that the profession works as one and it doesn’t expose itself through fighting and internal bickering. It’s hugely counter-productive and we need to make sure we present a unified front.

I hope that in the way we continue to affect health, that we continue to improve it and that we’re seen as significant players in the improvement of health of the nation as well.

So, whilst I don’t think dentistry will ever be properly integrated into the NHS per se, because we’re a primary care sector of what is primarily a secondary care business, I think that I’ve been treated as a profession with respect and credibility is hugely important and I hope that what I’ve done over the six years is to facilitate that and to move that on.

At all times I think what I’ve tried to do is to promote the integrity of the profession and I hope that I’ve been an ambassador for that.

NK: I think you have.

SS: Thank you very much.
