Dental associations speak up over whitening debate

Could this be the call for reclarification on whiteneing products?

The European Union is currently reviewing the EU Cosmetics Directive, which it is hoped will provide a coherent legal framework for the provision of tooth whitening products in the U.K. Meanwhile, the BDDBS and the BDA are urging Trading Standards officers to maintain the low-key approach to enforcement around the supply of whitening products to dental professionals previously advised by Local Government Regulation (LACORS).

The BDA would like to see the previous low-key approach to enforcement around the supply of whitening products to dental professionals previously advised by LACORS and taken by trading standards re-instated.

Stuart Johnston, Chair of the BDA’s Representative Body, said: “The recently-changed approach to the supply of whitening products, and particularly the impact the investigation being undertaken in Essex is having, is a significant concern for patient safety. This must be addressed as a matter of urgency and the previously adopted low-key approach to supply to dental professionals reinstated. A significant body of evidence demonstrates the safety of whitening products when used by trained dental professionals. We urge trading standards officers to adopt a pragmatic approach that recognises this and puts patient safety first.”

In a statement from the BDDBS, there is no question around patient safety when dentists observe the following guidelines:

- A full examination must take place before any bleaching procedure
- Informed patient consent is paramount and patients must have alternatives and risks thoroughly explained
- Before and after photos must be taken and retained throughout the course, and following completion of treatment
- Any products supplied for home use by a dental practice must meet Scientific Committee on Consumer Products (SCCP) guidelines
- There should be a commitment by the trade not to supply beauticians or the public direct.

Pomegranate power

A new university study has found that pomegranate juice reduces stress hormone levels in British workers. Researchers at Queen Margaret University, Edinburgh studied the physiological effect of daily consumption of 500ml of Pomegranate Pure pomegranate juice over a two-week period and found that daily consumption caused a significant reduction in the level of stress hormone cortisol in saliva and a significant reduction in systolic and diastolic blood pressure in all volunteers. Volunteers also showed an improvement in arthritis health as measured by pulse wave velocity. Volunteers were also assessed on mood status using a specialist test.

After consumption of pomegranate juice most subjects reported that they were more enthusiastic, inspired, proud and active and all reported that they were less distressed, nervous, guilty and ashamed according to the attributes tested. The full results of the study will be presented at an international conference in Barcelona in October.

Toothless tourist

DTI: On May 8, an expedition investigating the cause of the vanishing lakes in the Blue Mountains World Heritage Area, stumbled across dentures that had gone missing there about 30 years ago. A German tourist had lost them while boating in the Thirlmere Lakes area, south-west of Sydney. Ms Graham and the environment writer Dan Wilson confirmed the teeth’s history with the former owners of the holiday camp that once graced the lake’s shore. They now aim to return the teeth even though no one now remembers the name of the German tourist.
